Herpesvirus K8.1A possesses an unusual region within its UL70 open reading frame encoding a putative alpha-chymotrypsin-like calcium-dependent cysteine proteinase. To examine the importance of this protease for the lytic cycle of herpesvirus K8.1A, we inactivated and deleted its coding region. Our results show that deletion of the protease coding region causes a delay in the kinetics of virus growth, with lysis of most infected cells being delayed by 18 h compared with control cells. Inactivation of the protease coding region also results in reduced plaque size in Madin-Darby canine kidney (MDCK) cells and reduced virus spread in cell culture. It is likely that the protease is involved in the processing of the viral glycoprotein gM/gO, as levels of gM/gO are reduced in cells lacking the protease. Interestingly, the majority of gM/gO is associated with host cell membranes in infected cells and deletion
