With the introduction of the new dark skin option, the new channel mixer, and some new lens corrections, Elements 18 is a very good, complete app. And as with a lot of Adobe software, once you get to know an item, you get accustomed to using it. I will miss the old size controls. It was the only way to get the sizes you really cared about. I still find I use the crop tool, but I also love the use of tabs. A gasket for the crop tool and tabs for the other tools, just seem logical. The most positive aspect of Lightroom 5 is that it will finally address an issue that we have been reporting on for a few years now: Multi-processing. If you have ever worked with Lightroom Classic, you know how frustrating it is when you want to use a B-Rate file in A-Rate. That doesn't mean that if you buy A-Rate that you will never be able to use B-Rate with it - you can, in fact, freely use B-Rate in A-Rate products-it's just limiting.

Once in Lightroom 5, you can edit on an A-Rate image at a higher quality while editing the same image on a lower quality version of A-Rate in the same Library. This means that, in a nutshell, a whole batch file of images can be processed on Adobe Camera Raw, while the actual finished edits will be done on a higher quality setting. It is very good that Adobe has finally, after several years of release, addressed this issue. There are, however, a couple of things that didn't quite work as expected. First and foremost, you can only process one filter at a time with Lightroom 5. This means that, for example, if you're in the process of editing the effects in the Nik Silver Efex Pro 2, you can't be using yet another adjustment filter. The same goes for the Nik editing tools: if you are in the process of editing the opacity using the Nik Opacity Panel, you can't be using yet another opacity slider. This is pretty self-explanatory, but it is good to see that there is some thought put into these interfaces.
