I'm using the ability of the professional version of Photoshop to simulate the Good Digital Darkroom as a baseline sky for the iKIHD illustrations I've been doing. Here's how it works: I used a high-key sky for a landscape. Then I simulated the same lighting in Photoshop to give me the right amount of exposure needed to create the scene. I took a single set of images with several lens options and several different DX cameras. I then compared them with the iKIHD visuals and found the perfect exposure. The option works and is much faster than time-consuming and tedious trial and error. Hopefully, it will be a very useful tool for the burgeoning creatives of the future. Good news for mass and social media users: The "Arrange, crop, and whiten images and videos" module that was previously in pre-release version 5 has also made its way to flattened version 5. It can be found in the Adjustment Layers menu (Tools > Adjustment Layers). The menu, which contains modules for various photo effects, will now -- for the first time -- include built-in media-editing features, such as the module that arranges and preserves face and voice points, separating photos into groups, taking individual photos, deleting scenes, monotoning, and so forth. The Photos module, which was previously based on Adobe's Smart Filters (which were later incorporated into the DAM (Digital Asset Management) module), is now a standalone module. It allows you to enable and disable the various effects (such as adjusting color, saturation, and even hue). It can now be found under Adjustments (Smart Filters), Photoshop Elements 5.
